

Page 4 of 32 × 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 14 × Lest × ▼

ebay

The building has lain empty since the factory gates shut in 1973, with over 100 windows boarded up untouched for years.

The Glasgow-born artist is a practitioner of painting, sculpture and photography and is renowned for bringing these to create his unique style of 'constructed photography'.

Currently artist in resident at Edinburgh Printmakers, his current Union Street exhibition called A Magic Box: Calum Colvi an 'archaeology of his creative practice' from the last 28 years.

He said: "This will be a hub for the arts in this area way to tag this building with what's going on.

erts for creativity and a call to the creative spirit.

Index are adverts for creativity and a call to the creative spirit.

*A lot of people are not really infrared in going to a gallery to see work so this way the

*It might draw them in and then if they like it, they can come to the exhibition too, beca

*It is great to see modern buildings but it is also nice to see old buildings being preserve

The team working on the installation hope to have all of their 120 posters up by the start of this week, but say the initial ready caught the attention of people passing by.

Explaining the installation, Calum said: "The posters are details of pict from different exhibitions.

"They are painted sets that are then photographed. It is a combination of painting, sculpture and photography.

"Host of them have some sort of relation to Scotland and quite a lot have a link to Edinburgh. One of the themes in my work hactory and identity."

Calum, who is a professor of Fine Art Photography at Dundee's Duncan of Jordanstone Art and Design college, says his faw the building is the combination of photography and graffiti.

"In time, the posters will probably be spray-painted over, but I quite like that, mixing the deri-painting and the posters.

*From the street, it will make a good view for people and highlight the future of t